

Peter Iverson '67

Distinguished Achievement

A professor of history at Arizona State University, Peter Iverson is one of the world's best young scholars of Native American history.

While at Carleton, Iverson was a member of the CSA and the College Council, wrote for the Carletonian, and played several intramural sports. He graduated with a major in history and was awarded a Ph.D. in history from the University of Wisconsin-Madison in 1975.

In addition to his teaching at Arizona State, Iverson returned to Carleton as an Anderson Foundation Fellow in 1991 to teach Introduction to Native American History for the American Studies Department. He has been the president of the Western Social Science Association, and has been awarded the Chief Manuelito Appreciation Award by the Navajo Nation.

Iverson and his wife Kaaren live in Tempe, AZ, and have four children: Timothy Warder (Carleton '87), Scott Warder, Erika Iverson, and Jens Iverson.
